Rights are not enough.

After all, in the present day, some animals in some places do have some rights.

Yet, these rights are diminished by loopholes, exceptions, and omissions.

Rights can be unenforced or revoked overnight.

Despite rights, most animals are still oppressed.

The same is true for humans and the environment.

So, rights, like welfare reforms, while good and necessary as part of institutional and legal changes, are insufficient, whether for humans, animals, or the environment.

We must champion not just rights and more rights (or welfare and more welfare), but liberation.

Liberation for the animals,
for the humans, &
for the environment.

Will we achieve Liberation?

For everyone everywhere forever?

I don't think so.

Not Now.

Not In One Generation.

Not In Our Lifetime.

Not in thousands
or tens of thousands of years.

Even if achieved, liberation would require constant defense.

Ultimately, I despair.

Despair can destroy us.

Hope can delude us.

But we can have both.

Community and history can give us hope.

Not that we will ultimately win, but that we are not alone in resistance.

Whether we can win or have hope, we can fight anyway.

As some among us have always fought and some who succeed us will continue to fight.

For those alive and dying today, those to come, and those who fought and suffered before us.

Though we're outnumbered,
countless people fought before
us against even greater odds.

Though we're outnumbered,
countless people fight amidst
us against even greater odds.

Though we're outnumbered,
countless people will fight after
us against even greater odds.

Despite the woes and resignation, we can and must fight anyway as long as possible.

At home and across the world.

Now.

And with a view toward eternity.
